TEXTO DE APOIO

The Cerrado is Brazil's second largest biome. It covers nearly a quarter of the country's landmass and it is famous for its wide range of landscapes, including grasslands, savanna and dry forests. The region is very important for the national economy: large farms there produce soy and cattle for the whole world. Today, however, scientists are warning society about a serious problem. More than half of the Cerrado is already without its native vegetation, and the biome is losing more area every year. Researchers are studying the region because it shelters over 3,000 plant species and hundreds of mammals, birds, reptiles and amphibians that do not exist anywhere else on the planet. Right now, environmental organisations are working with local communities, and many students are learning about the biome during the Semana do Cerrado.
